

Project One: Homelessness

This file contains the workflow I used for the project topic Homelessness

First Version

I choose to work with homeless students in New York state. I picked up this topic because this is probably the social class most affected by homelessness, given that they are young and must make decisions that will guide and impact adult life. The infographic is based on The Economist magazine style. Everything I used here is also available on my GitHub.

The infochartic was designed mainly in four sections. 1. The first section includes a chart containing the total number of homeless students from 2009 to 2021. I decided to use a line chart because it is easier to see trends in time. Aligned with this chart, I included a map of students' homeless per county in New York state. I decided to use counties because I want to show that this problem is happening across the whole state.

2. Given that New York has 62 counties and it would be hard to make a chart representing each of them well, I tried to show these changes in the second section using the New York economic region's boundaries. I chose a stream chart to display the data over time because I wanted to show trends in the increased proportion between the areas simultaneously. Besides, it allowed me to avoid lines overlapping within the chart. I included a map showing the proportion increase in 2021 compared to 2009 per economic region. My idea of plotting both chart and map is to show that the rise in homeless students is unrelated to the region area size and that only looking at the percentage increase does not represent the number of students per region well.

3. In the third section, I use a line chart to show which schools these students attend and how disproportional it is over time. I also included a bar chart showing the proportion changes in 2021 compared to 2009.

4. The fourth section is dedicated to the show the students' proportion per school grade over time, using a bumpchart. My choice for a bumpchat was because it allowed me to show the overlap between lines and trends better than the line chart. This section also has a bar chart comparing 2021 to 2009 for each grade. Since I do not have the data relative to students' age, I considered using grades to proxy how old these people living in homeless conditions are.

The figure below is a free-hand draft I made before designing the infographic using Adobe Illustrator®.

Student Homelessness Status in New York ^{Regions} ~~Counties~~ over the last 10 years

How many of these changes per school type?

I'm not sure about this part.

How much did it change per Regions?

Choropleth map?

What about counties per Region?

Problem of having 62 counties.

The page below is the first version of the project proposed here. Some considerations I have for the second version:

1. Maybe remove the bar chart of section three or include it within the line chart in this section since this bar chart seems a little redundant.
2. Finding some neat way to replace or show the bumpchat chart in section four.
3. Draw an image at the top of the last chart of section four.
4. Include information about where these students live when they are not in school.

Second Version

In the second version, I changed the second graph to a slope chart to avoid the repetition of chart aesthetics. Using a Sankey chart, I also included information about where these students live when they are not in school. I also tried filling the white/empty space with some information or aesthetics.

Third Version

I changed the third and fourth charts to a line and bar chart in the third version, respectively. The reason was to make the stylish less chaotic and to highlight the last chart, as it is the main chart on the infographic. Besides, using bar charts seemed more reasonable to compare the years and to get the point straight to the point.

I also removed the illustrations because they did not fit the story well and the magazine's style. I changed the colors according to The Economists requirements.

I am considering changing charts three and four about the homeless home after school for the fourth version since it seems to occupy considerable space and bring more attention than they should. For graph three, I am considering plotting the line chart above its respective bar graph, keeping them the same size. For graph four, I am thinking of splitting it into four charts (one for each type of home)

Forth/final Version

In the fourth and final version, I kept the same structure but focusing more on fixing typos and spaces between boxes. I also changed the text font size. The last chart, the main one, looked weird because of the curve lines that were so thick, so I tried to make it thin, and I think it looked better. However, when saving it as PDF, there was no change.

I also tried to change the two charts on the top of the second page, trying to make them separate, but they looked very weird. First, there was a big blank space because the proportion of the residence places is very different. Second, I tried to fix it by changing the scale, but then the reader would need to read each scale independently to compare each bar chart against another. So, I decided to keep just one bar chart setting the same numerical scale for every bar of home places, which looked better, in order to see the difference and compare them.

This way, the final version of this project has seven charts approaching different topics.

I used two line charts and one bump chart to show differences over time in the number of homeless students, the schools these students used to attend, and how many of them were in each school's grades. For the last one, I also included a bar chart for each school grade showing the absolute difference between 2009 and 2021. These two approaches also allowed having an idea of how old these students were.

I used a slope chart to show the trends and absolute differences across New York state economic regions. I aimed to show that a higher proportion of increase does not necessarily mean a high number of students. Most charts and infographics on the internet used to show differences using percentage differences, but we need to be careful using this approach because we may end up making assumptions that might impact human resources decisions. I used two maps to show these differences across New York state, one for counties and another one for economic regions.

I tried to use bar charts to show the differences between 2009 and 2021 for each data and information I had, including school types and residences these students spent overnight after school.

The story of this project shows that New York state has many students under homeless conditions, which increased from 2009 to 2021. They comprise 93% of the total homeless people in the whole state. Some counties and economic regions have more increase in proportion or several students than others. Just looking at the ratio is not enough to decide on this matter. School district type has disproportionately received more students than charter schools, which might result in an overpopulation of students and management issues. However, many students seem to have a place to stay overnight rather than on the streets. Over time, there were more old homeless students in school than younger ones, maybe because it is easier to be adopted as young as you are.
